Hello,

As my submission to this Enquiry, I would like to draw your attention to the prescription of medicinal cannabis in Australia, and driving laws. As was recently publicised, a member of the public who was prescribed medicinal cannabis but not intoxicated by it was charged with driving under the influence as it was found within their system. Unlike alcohol where a specific percentage is given, any percentage of cannabis found in one's system is grounds for a charge. Unlike individuals who are prescribed ADHD medication and are allowed to drive, individuals who are prescribed cannabis for their chronic issues are treated as criminals even if they had not taken their prescription that day. I highly recommend you check out the ACMA and their suggestions for revisions on medicinal cannabis driving laws as the laws are currently unjust.
